The Bird at Dawn.
What I saw was just one eye
In the dawn as I was going;
A bird can carry all the eyes
In that little button glowing.

Never in my life I went
So deep into the forest.

He was standing on a tree,
All in blossom overflowing;

And he purposely turned his Head.

At first, as if to question me,
Where are you going?

But, never mind, set more serious
Things to him, he would not speak.

I could not answer, could not think Noway.

Oh, that hard, round, and so distracting eye!

Little birdie of all that!

And then the afternoon number:

Hold, and wait, radiation back on me.

If no man had invented human weakness,

And a breathing land been

The world, we'd never what we

What would we men have heard,

What understand, what seen,

Between the trills and pauses, in

The singing and the silence of a bird?

—By Harold Morro, from the

"Book of Modern British Verse."
